..... Informing the public about the crisis in Syria means building up a reporting structure that can keep track of and report on all the various news streams. One way to approach this is to set up a website with a page for each of the main channels into the country — namely radio, television, print, and online. Then as independent reporters make their way into each of the countries and generate reports, they can upload them directly to the relevant page. Of course, all this would require a good deal of money to set up. But if the collection of independent reporting websites were collectively to invest in a collective blog that could be used as a central news hub, the results could be significant. The more up to date the blog, the more it would act as a filter for information sources that people could use without any need for experience or training. It might also be possible to create a news aggregator tool that automatically collates the coverage from various blogs and maintains a headline summary for each of the news stories. This would provide a centralized alternative to Twitter alerts that are used to mark the major events in the ongoing war that claim the lives of thousands of innocent Syrians.
